Keeping Computers Alive

May 2010. ISSUE 04.

End of Free Web?

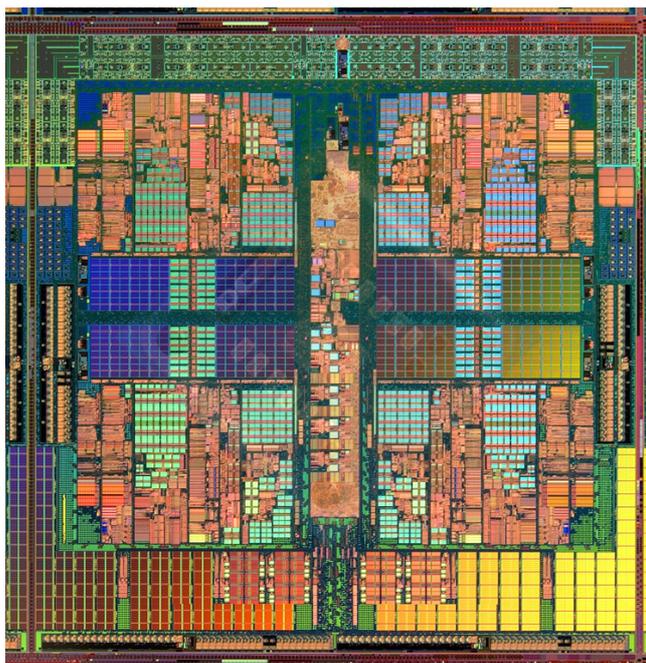

With the newspapers gradually moving to subscription only to view their content online, then yes it is the end of everything free on the web. However it is a gradual thing and prices are very low.

Recently I have been looking at how you can sell an ebook or mp3 online. It requires using a 3rd party to handle the payment and another one to initiate the download. Both are available for free while the sales are relatively small. So the potential is there for someone who's created something to make money before they have to spend any. This is a model that works and will remain, so no not the end of the free web.

New CPU

In the last six months computers have I'm sure been far from peoples minds. There has been though one major development. That is the processor chip will have its own memory function. This will have the effect of cutting out the middle man greatly improving performance. So look out for computers that can fit in your ear in about 5 years.

Audio Guide

The much requested and long awaited audio guide for beginners is here: www.pchsbanbury.co.uk/PCHSGuideBeginners4625 After several failed attempts to provide a comprehensive guide, I relented and just reeled it out. Feedback on this would be appreciated.

Testimonial

Liza Hopkinson

I'm a complete computer 'imbecile', but Stephen has been looking after me & my computer for the last six years. Sometimes he's had to take it to 'hospital', but usually he sorts out my problems in minutes. Not only is he great value for money, but he is knowledgeable and, for people like me, uses non-technical terms to explain what he is doing. As long as he gets a cuppa (tea/coffee black with one sugar) he always sorts out any problems quickly, efficiently and with a smile. If he says he'll be there at a certain time he never disappoints.

I've told numerous friends about his friendly service and they all are as impressed as I am.

MACS

I am now doing more with macs.
